Did you know that if you eat on a smaller plate something triggers in your brain to tell you that you have eaten enough? The fact that I have lost weight at all has me super-amazed. I feel like all I do is eat. My energy level is starting to increase and my headaches are disappearing. Kellie Hill at The Right Plan is AMAZING. Who would have thought that by eating you can lose weight?

I am moving forward and upward. The scale is moving down. I have come to realize that my family is really on the go. Pre-planning on-the-go foods (foods that you literally grab and go out the door) has been something that I have finally mastered while still trying to tackle portions. My goal is to eat when I am hungry and also eat a portion. Also, to create balance on my plate with veggies, protein, fat, carbs. Permanent eating habits take time. I am happy to say that the changes that I have made are not only affecting me, but also my family in a positive way!

As a Nutritional Therapy Practitioner, I believe that health is built on certain biochemical foundations – digestion, blood sugar balance, mineral balance, fatty acid balance, and hydration – which are individual to each person. Weaknesses in these foundations can lead to various health problems. In order to find optimal health we have to identify if there is an imbalance in any of these foundations. With Jami, I chose to have her complete the Online Nutritional Assessment Questionnaire in order to create a customized nutritional program. The answers she provided help me identify how to improve her health. Readers can complete the same Online Nutritional Assessment at www.therightnutritionplan.com. Based on her answers this week she will be learning a variety of recipes for leafy greens.

When I first started this Challenge, my main goal was weight loss and secondarily to do strength training. Now 15 days in, my focus has changed to fitness rather than just weight loss. The whole body workouts I am now doing along with cardio exercises has caused me to shift emphasis and pay attention more to the real and claimed benefits of strength training. Fitness is the result. And fitness, by the way, is defined as a “set of attributes that people have or achieve that relates to the ability to perform physical activity” (U.S. Dept. of Health and Human Services).

If you look up online for the benefits and rewards of workouts in a gym you find a very long list. Everything from postponing death to living a life of high self-esteem is claimed as possible outcomes. In sifting through these claims, I recently came across a sensible and believable benefits list from Berkeley Wellness, a health publication of the University of California. These include: stronger muscles, and bones; a toned body that makes you look slimmer; reduced blood pressure, blood sugar and cholesterol. And, it may improve cognition in older people. These improvements seem valid and achievable to me, and some of them I have already experienced.

It helps to know these benefits can be attained because these workouts, I find, are not entirely enjoyable: there are moments of discomfort and strain as you push beyond previous plateaus. But overall, the feeling of accomplishment, plus the belief that you are respecting your body, makes up for the momentary pain. And the icing on the cake is the compliments. After only two weeks, I am getting comments like: "Hey, you're looking good!!"

I'm really excited about Mark and his fitness plan. He has a goal to lose at least 2.5 percent body fat by the end of the month, and I can tell he's changing already. For 2014, Mark has a goal to lose 8.5 percent body fat and to lose 20 pounds.

His workouts are improving dramatically after each time I see him. At first, I thought I needed to supervise him for each workout, but just after three sessions, he's improving so much that I don't have correct his form as often as expected. Overall, I want to say he's staying very positive, getting more into it each time I see him, and I know he will do well.

There are a lot of diet plans out there to choose from – and, in truth, almost every plan has worked for someone. But finding the right individual plan is the key to quickly achieving goals and finding long term success. To do this, Jami completed a simple questionnaire to help identify where her body derives energy from, how her body stores fat, and which foods will help create balance for her individual body type. This helps create an individual plan with personalized recipes. This week we will discuss proper portion sizing to ensure that not only is she eating the best nutrient-dense foods for her body, but in the proper amounts and ratio. Readers can complete the same questionnaire as Jami to receive an individual plan and portion sizing information at therightnutritionplan.com What and When to Eat.

I have decided that change totally sucks! I like what I like. Really, don't we all? In order to make a life change, I have had to change my mindset! My semi-sedentary lifestyle has come to an end. Exercise at the gym has become my morning routine. Kellie Hill at the Right Plan has me eating. I feel like I eat all day long. Funny thing is that I am losing weight. I am eating foods that I have chosen. They are not off of a strict list or out of a book that has a "DO" or a "DON'T" list, food that is from an actual store! This week's goal is portions. Do we ever really eat an actual portion of anything? Cereal, I love cereal. Have you ever actually stopped and measured a cup of cereal? Trying to keep up with change in my life and so far change is good!

I am starting to view myself as a series of muscle groups: Rhomboids (major and minor), abs, deltoid, glutes, hamstring, etc. I told Steve, my trainer, to tell me more as I have not paid much attention to these systems before. At his gym, there is a machine and specific exercise to strengthen and stretch each muscle group. I was told my muscles were mostly all tight due to a sedentary life. Hardest for me was the elliptical machine that got my heart rate up to about 140 beats a minute after doing a motion that mimics being on cross-country skis. It was a bit stressful to go about five miles per hour for a period of time on that machine

I felt good afterward and began to think favorably for the first time, and realistically, that I could continue these work outs as part of my life in the future. It is noteworthy that the predominant fellow gym members are young females, with an occasional older person also of both genders. Are work outs primarily attractive to young people?

It is crucially important to have someone introduce you to the regime so that you go about things properly and avoid injury. My last encounter with a gym years ago was not favorable as I pulled something in my knee by improperly dismounting some machine. I recall being told either boredom or injury is the usual fate of gym participants. Nowadays, of course, there are video screens and music to keep you distracted if that is what you need to keep it up. I will bring an ear bud next time.

In our first and second sessions, Mark and I established some achievable goals and put a clear plan in place. He's going to work out with me three times a week for the next month. We have measured and logged his current strength, cardio endurance, body fat, inches and weight. I believe Mark is going to do very well with this plan and see significant improvements within the next month.

Wow. I am daily gaining awareness of what I am choosing to put into my body and how different foods make me feel! I am shocked to learn that certain foods can affect my moods. Let me tell you some foods that I love make me happy and some foods that I love make me grumpy, irritated and left feeling bloated. Meeting with Kellie Hill at the Right Plan has been an eye-opening experience already in such a short amount of time! We all know that we need to stay away from processed sugar, that caffeine is bad, eat less, add lean protein and exercise more. But do we really? I am learning that one diet does not fit all. Funny that I have tried a few others and failed. The weight did come off, but seemed to go right back on when the diet was over. Eating for me is changing my outlook on food and on life. I have only lost a few pounds, yet I feel a ton lighter.

I am feeling energized by the public character of this health challenge. I have worked solo on fitness in the past, but now, in facing the discipline necessary for dieting to lose weight, I am much more motivated than before. I believe this is because I am not just doing this to please myself, but others as well. And being witnessed by others enhances my sense of responsibility. This double whammy is working wonders so far. I have lost 3 pounds in four days by following a diet of virtually no starch, no cream in my coffee, no alcohol, drinking lots of water, avoiding second helpings and exercise (currently, an hour walk a day).

Tomorrow I have the first session with the trainer, Steve. I don't know what to expect other than I won't like it very much judging by past experience with upper body work outs. And I am fearful of injury to my shoulders. I hope Steve will start me out very slowly and things will go well.

I felt headachy when I awoke this morning. I assume this is because I am eating less, maybe not enough. My wife is noticing that I am more impatient with her and this is undoubtedly due to my being on the edge of hunger, maybe too close. She is not joining me in this venture, but I am alright with that. Maybe she will join me later.

Jami is beginning a diet and lifestyle change that she will be able to maintain permanently without making multiple meals for her family or feeling deprived. There are two keys for success in this first week. First, focus in on one goal and be specific. Then, do a quick reality check. Have you tried this before? If so, what happened? What's different now? Are you willing to make lifestyle/diet changes now? Does this feel like the right time? Make sure you are able to match the level of commitment required to achieve your goal. If not, redefine your goal so you can succeed. Second, start a food log. Write down everything you eat for meals and snacks as well as any beverages you drink. Don't judge your food choices. At the end of each week, note two not-so-healthy foods and swap them out for more nutritious options.

My journey to a better me has begun. I was excited for this time in my life to arrive and now I am scared to death that it is here! People always say that change is good. Why am I not so convinced? I was asked by Kellie (nutritionist) to write down daily my food intake of everything that I eat or drink. Have you ever tried it? To be completely honest, it is so hard. I do not realize everything that goes into my mouth in a day! Coffee drinks! Yikes! I have not even gotten into calories or anything super diet-y yet! Life is a process and mine has started!

Realizing it is time to begin the challenge, I felt at first like a cloud had descended on me, but then maybe it's a blessing. To be doing this challenge in a public way immediately sends a signal to be serious. I would hate to disgrace myself by failing in my own eyes, and worse, in the eyes of others, even those unknown to me.

Got on the scale right away and found to my chagrin that I had gained over the holidays. No surprise there. Current weight 213 lbs. Yikes, so high! My goal for the next thirty days is to lose a pound a week. This means I want to weigh 209 lbs. or less in thirty days. I would love to exceed this goal. To do it means burning or losing 500 calories a day. I hope, no, I KNOW, this is possible. Plan: veggies, fruit, no or little bread and other starches, no alcohol plus portion control, as in NO SECONDS.
